

Workplace Innovation Wednesdays – April 2018 – week three

We've spent much of this week talking to companies about the forthcoming launch of our Leadership for Workplace Innovation programme, combining an Institute for Leadership and Management (ILM) Level 5 qualification with practical support for workplace change. Participants will benefit from a state-of-the-art online learning platform, peer-to-peer exchanges of experiences with companies on similar journeys, and face-to-face coaching and facilitation.

This will be the 'must have' programme for current and aspiring leaders – so contact us for a friendly chat!

How can we combine the potential of digital technologies with human potential?

A report published last week by the admirable European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions (Eurofound) is the latest to offer 'Industry 4.0' insights into the nature and potential of digital technologies for the future of work and the economy.

But does current thinking go far enough?

Companies need a clear roadmap to guide them through the strategic choices involved in the adoption of digital technologies. Achieving the best balance between technological potential and human potential is vital if companies are to achieve effective returns on investments.
